CICERO has, with his uſual Elegance and Magnificence of Language, attempted, in his Relation of the Dream of Scipio, to depreciate thoſe Honours for which he himſelf appears to have panted with reſtleſs and importunate Solicitude, by ſhewing within what narrow limits all that Fame and Celebrity which Man can hope from Men is circumſcribed.

"You ſee," ſays Africanus, pointing at the Earth from the celeſtial Regions, "that the Globe aſſigned to the Reſidence and Habitation of human Beings is "of ſmall Dimenſions: How then can you obtain from the Praiſe of Men, any Glory "worthy of a Wiſh? Of this little World the inhabited Parts are neither numerous "nor wide; even the Spots where Men are found, are broken by intervening Deſerts; "and the Nations are ſo ſeparated as that nothing can be tranſmitted from one to ano-"ther. With the People of the South, by whom the oppoſite Part of the Earth is "poſſeſſed, you have no Intercourſe; and by how ſmall a Tract do you communicate "with the Countries of the North? The Territory which you inhabit is no more than "a ſcanty Iſland, incloſed by a ſmall Body of Water, to which you give the Name of "the great Sea, and the Atlantick Ocean. And even in this known and frequented Con-"tinent, what Hope can you entertain, that your Renown will paſs the Stream of "Ganges, or the Cliffs of Caucaſus? or by whom will your Name be uttered in the "Extremities of the North or South, towards the Riſing or the Setting Sun? So nar-"row is the Space to which your Fame can be propagated, and even there how long will "it remain?"

He then proceeds to aſſign natural Cauſes why Fame is not only narrow in its Extent, but ſhort in its Duration; he obſerves the Difference between the Computation of Time in Earth and Heaven, and declares, that according to the celeſtial Chronology, no human Honours can laſt a ſingle Year.

Such are the Objections by which Tully has made a Shew of diſcouraging the Purſuit of Fame; Objections which ſufficiently diſcover his Tenderneſs and Regard for his darling Phantom. Homer, when the Plan of his Poem made the Death of Patrocles neceſſary, reſolved, at leaſt, that he ſhould die with Honour; and, therefore, brought down againſt him the Patron God of Troy, and left to Hector only the mean Taſk of giving the laſt Blow to an Enemy whom a divine Hand had diſabled from Reſiſtance. Thus Tully ennobles Fame, which he profeſſes to degrade by oppoſing it to celeſtial Happineſs; he confines not its Extent but by the Boundaries of Nature, nor contracts its Duration but by repreſenting it ſmall in the Eſtimation of ſuperior Beings. He ſtill admits it the higheſt and nobleſt of terreſtrial Objects, and alleges little more againſt it, than that it is neither without End, nor without Limits.

What might be the Effect of theſe Obſervations conveyed in Ciceronian Eloquence to Roman Underſtandings, cannot be determined; but few of thoſe who ſhall in the preſent Age read my humble Verſion will find themſelves much depreſſed in their Hopes, or retarded in their Deſigns; for I am not inclined to believe, that they who among us paſs their Lives in the cultivating of Knowledge, or the Acquiſition of Power, have very anxiouſly enquired what Opinions prevail on the farther Banks of the Ganges, or have invigorated any Effort by the Deſire of ſpreading their Renown among the Clans of Caucaſus. The Hopes and Fears of modern Minds are content to range in a narrower Compaſs; a ſingle Nation, and a few Years, have generally ſufficient Amplitude to fill our Imagination.

A little Conſideration will indeed teach us, that Fame has other Limits than Mountains and Oceans; and that he who places Happineſs in the frequent Repetition of his Name, may ſpend his Life in propagating it, without any Danger of weeping for new Worlds, or Neceſſity of paſſing the Atlantick Sea.

The Numbers to whom any real and perceptible Good or Evil can be derived by the greateſt Power, or moſt active Diligence, are inconſiderable; and where neither Benefit nor Miſchief operate, the only Motive to the Mention or Remembrance of others is Curioſity; a Paſſion, which, though in ſome Degree univerſally aſſociated with Reaſon, is eaſily confined, overborn, or diverted from any particular Object.

Among the lower Claſſes of Mankind, there will be found very little Deſire of any other Knowledge, than what may contribute immediately to the Relief of ſome preſſing Uneaſineſs, or the Attainment of ſome near Advantage. The Turks are ſaid to hear with Wonder a Propoſal to walk out, only that they may walk back; and enquire, why any Man ſhould labour for nothing: So thoſe whoſe Condition has always reſtrained them to the Contemplation of their own Neceſſities, and who have been accuſtomed to look forward only to a ſmall Diſtance, will ſcarcely underſtand, why Nights and Days ſhould be ſpent in Studies, which end in new Studies, and which, according to Malherbe's Obſervation, do not tend to leſſen the Price of Bread; nor will the Trader or Manufacturer eaſily be perſuaded, that much Pleaſure can ariſe from the mere Knowledge of Actions, performed in remote Regions, or in diſtant Times; or that any Thing can deſerve their Enquiry, of which we can only hear the Report, but which cannot influence our Lives by any Conſequences.

The Truth is, that very few have Leiſure from indiſpenſible Buſineſs, to employ their Thoughts upon Narrative or Characters; and among thoſe to whom Fortune has given the Liberty of living more by their own Choice, many create to themſelves Engagements, by the Indulgence of ſome petty Ambition, the Admiſſion of ſome inſatiable Deſire, or the Toleration of ſome predominant Paſſion. The Man whoſe whole Wiſh is to accumulate Money, has no other Care than to collect Intereſt, to eſtimate Securities, and to enquire for Mortgages: The Lover diſdains to turn his Ear to any other Name than that of Corinna; and the Courtier thinks the Hour loſt, which is not ſpent in promoting his Intereſt, and facilitating his Advancement. The Adventures of Valour, and the Diſcoveries of Science, will find a cold Reception, when they are obtruded upon an Attention, thus buſy with its favourite Amuſement, and impatient of Interruption or Diſturbance.

But not only ſuch Employments as ſeduce Attention by the Appearance of Dignity, or the Promiſe of Happineſs, may reſtrain the Mind from Excurſion and Enquiry; Curioſity may be equally deſtroyed by leſs formidable Enemies; it may be diſſipated in Trifles, or congealed by Indolence. The Sportſmen and the Men of Dreſs have their Heads filled with a Fox or a Horſe-race, a Feather or a Ball; and live in Ignorance of every Thing beſide, with as much Content as he that heaps up Gold, or ſolicits Preferment, digs the Field, or beats the Anvil; and ſome dream out their Days without Pleaſure or Buſineſs, without Joy or Sorrow, nor ever rouſe from their Lethargy to hear or think.

Even of thoſe who have dedicated themſelves to Knowledge, the far greater Part have confined their Curioſity to a few Objects, and have very little Inclination to promote any Fame, but that of which their own Studies entitle them to partake. The Naturaliſt has no Deſire to know the Opinions or Conjectures of the Philologer: The Botaniſt looks upon the Aſtronomer, as a Being unworthy of his Regard: The Lawyer ſcarcely hears the Name of a Phyſician without Contempt; and he that is growing great and happy by electrifying a Bottle, wonders how the World can be engaged by triffling Prattle about War or Peace.

If, therefore, he that imagines the World filled with his Actions and Praiſes, ſhall ſubduct from the Number of his Encomiaſts, all thoſe who are placed below the Flight of Fame, and who hear in the Vallies of Life no other Voice than that of Neceſſity; all thoſe who imagine themſelves too important to regard him, and conſider the Mention of his Name, as an Uſurpation of their Time; all who are too much, or too little, pleaſed with themſelves, to attend to any Thing external; all who are attracted by Pleaſure, or chained down by Pain, to unvaried Ideas; all who are with-held from attending his Triumph by different Purſuits; and all who ſlumber in univerſal Negligence; he will find his Renown ſtreightened by nearer Bounds than the Rocks of Caucaſus, and perceive that no Man can be venerable or formidable, but to a ſmall Part of his Fellow-Creatures.

That we may not languiſh in our Endeavours after Excellence, it is neceſſary, that, as Africanus conſels his Deſcendant, "we raiſe our Eyes to higher Proſpects, and con-"template our future and eternal State, without giving up our Hearts to the Praiſe "of Crouds; or fixing our Hopes on ſuch Rewards as human Power can beſtow."

CONSTANTINOPLE, July 1.

AS we have had within the laſt Fortnight no leſs than three Fires within this Capital, by which upwards of four thouſand Houſes were deſtroyed, the Miſchiefs occaſioned thereby excited ſuch Murmurs and Tumults amongſt the People, that it was found abſolutely neceſſary, in Order to quiet them, to depoſe the Grand Vizir, and to baniſh him to Cyprus. The Maſter of the Horſe to his Sublime Highneſs has had the Seals delivered to him; but it is generally believed he will not hold them long. A Courier has been diſpatched to Peterſburg, with an Account of this and ſome other Reſolutions taken in the Divan.

Paris, Auguſt 1. A very odd Affair has happened here, which, it is thought, will have conſiderable Conſequences. Our Archbiſhop demanded of the Provoſt of the Merchants (reſembling the Office of Lord Mayor) a larger Quantity of Water to be laid into his Palace. That Magiſtrate, deſirous to oblige him, called a Common Council, in which, though it appeared that the Archbiſhop had the ſame Quantity with which his Predeceſſors have been content, a Minute was nevertheleſs made, that it ſhould be increaſed to near an Inch; that is, that he ſhould have as much Water as a Pipe of an Inch Bore will run in a Day, and which is as much as is allowed to a Prince of the Blood. The Town-Clerk was ordered to carry a Copy of this Minute to the Archbiſhop; who, having read it, tore it in Pieces, rubbed it under the Town-Clerk's Noſe, and ſaid, with great Indignation, 'There's your City's Inch.' The Common Council being acquainted with this, ordered the Minute to be eraſed out of their Books, and an Account of the whole Tranſaction to be laid before his Majeſty.

LONDON,

Auguſt 1. Since the Rubbiſh has been ſifted in Lincoln's Inn, we hear that moſt of the Gentlemen who were Sufferers by the Fire have had the chief Part of their Properties, in Plate and Caſh, reſtored to them, and Mr. Pickering, (Clerk to Mr. Wilbraham) who had Bank Notes in his Deſk to the Amount of eleven hundred Pounds, the Numbers of which were likewiſe burnt, has been ſo ſucceſsful as to re-eſtabliſh almoſt all of them.

On Wedneſday laſt a remarkable Cauſe, which has been ſome Time depending in Doctors-Commons, was determined by the Right worſhipful Dr. Simpſon, Chancellor of the Dioceſe of London, between S------, Eſq; and Miſs J------. In the Year 1743 Mr. S------, who was then in France, and about 18 Years of Age, was prevailed on to marry Miſs J------, then at the ſame Place, and about 15 Years of Age, which was done by a Romiſh Prieſt, for a conſiderable Sum of Money, according to the Ceremonies of the Church of Rome; but Mr. S------, tho' a Minor, repented of the raſh Act he had done, and refuſed to conſummate; ſoon after, his Friends inſtituted a Suit in France, and the Parliament of Paris pronounced againſt the Marriage and declared it void; for by their Laws, no Marriage can be good unleſs the Parties are 25 Years of Age, except the Parents Conſents are obtained. Mr. S------ ſome Time after returning to England, the young Lady's Friends commenced a new Suit in Doctors-Commons againſt the young Gentleman, for the Reſtitution of conjugal Rites; but it appearing plain to the Court, that the Marriage Ceremony was performed in a private Room, and in a very clandeſtine Manner, and that Mr. S---- never bedded with the young Lady, the Judge very judicially, and to the Satisfaction of the whole Court, (except the young Lady and her Friends) alſo pronounced againſt the Marriage, and declared it void; but in Regard the young Lady had been at great Expences in proſecuting her Claim to a Huſband ſhe thought ſhe had an undoubted Right to, the Chancellor gave her 400 l. Coſts, and diſmiſſed the Suit.
